

11 A Spicy Scent

"Fragrances are very much like garments," says perfumer Frédéric Malle. "It just doesn't feel right to wear the same thing in the winter that you did to the beach." That may be because, as perfumer Sophia Grojsman explains, "fragrance seems more subtle in the cold, because the pulse points are covered under layers of clothes." The right scents this time of year are warm, with spicy notes such as amber, clove, and nutmeg—they linger much longer in cool weather. There's a wide range, including the spicy floral Acqua di Parma Magnolia Nobile, the sexier Prada L'Eau Ambrée, and the green Dior Escale à Pondichéry.

A Low Ponytail

The slightly mussed ponytail has a certain Magritte-like logic: Ceci n'est pas une coiffure. "At Marni's fall runway show, the designer asked me to make it look like there wasn't a hair team at all," says Orlando Pita. He simply spritzed damp hair with T3 + Orlando Pita Plump Volumizer before blow-drying and let each model's part fall naturally. Then he teased the hair at the nape of the neck with a rattail comb for thickness before gathering it there in an elastic. Done. "With all the big collars and scarves right now," Pita says, "long hair is just too hairy."

Brick Red Nail Polish

It's happened to all of us: The manicurist is swiping on the topcoat when you glimpse another woman's finished nails and wish you'd gotten what she did. This winter, that woman is going to be wearing brick red. "It's a classic, neutral shade that's strong enough to balance all the bright makeup and clothing colors we're seeing this season," says Los Angeles manicurist April Foreman, whose favorite is Atame Nail Polish by Rescue Beauty Lounge (above). "It also adds a nice warmth to sallow winter skin." You (and your manicurist) can thank us later.
